“The idea that all human beings are endowed with some fundamental rights has been with us for almost five centuries now [...]. Throughout that time this idea has served as a powerful tool with which to criticize the conduct of actors both private and public [...] as well as to justify demands for legal and social reform. Even more important was the development that came in the late eighteenth century, when human rights began to gain a legal status proper, gradually becoming a central institution in contemporary legal systems at different levels [...]. On the contemporary understanding of fundamental rights, these rights are conditions of political legitimacy. They set limits and goals around the exercise of political authority and around the use of public resources. Fundamental rights establish the ways in which political authority cannot be exercised and public resources used—in ways that frustrate important individual interests—and the ways in which that authority should be exercised and those resources used, namely, to protect those interests from public and private violations and to enable them to be fulfilled”. (Preface, p. IX)
