Current Problems in Legal Research Quality Assessment

Abstract: The present contribution aims at underlying that the research quality assessment, beyond the debate on the functions of its system, is nowadays – even in the field of legal research – a fundamental tool for related public policies. At the same time, the increasing complexity of the evaluation's systems and methods is taken into account, especially with regard to the peculiarities of research in the legal field. Examples thereof may be found in the relationship between theory and praxis, in the importance of vocational training and, more generally, of didactics, as well as in the international dimension of the legal problems and in the growing tendency to provide researches, including the legal ones, with an interdisciplinary feature.

Keywords: Research quality assessment, Legal research, Relations between legal theory and other sciences.
