Foreword

Abstract: The following papers deal with the question of if – and at which costs – the goal of internationalising the Italian universities can be achieved by teaching entire courses “in english” (and, maybe, “only in english”). The question is complex, full of implications, and is tackled with a critical approach, starting from the specific disciplinary perspective of the single authors: law, history of law, political philosophy, linguistics and sociology.

Keywords: Internationalisation, Language policy, Preservation of the Italian language and culture, Autonomy of universities.
