Migrant Women and Legal Protection: Vulnerabilities and Rights in International and European Law

Abstract: This paper examines the legal condition of migrant women, emphasizing the intersection between systemic migration vulnerabilities and gender-based discrimination. It highlights how restrictive immigration policies and inconsistent application of international and European legal protections exacerbate their marginalization, exposing them to gender-based violence, labor exploitation, and limited access to fundamental rights. The analysis contrasts the securitarian approach to migration – focused on border control and deterrence – with a human rights-based framework, advocating for a paradigm shift that prioritizes inclusion and protection.

Keywords: Migrant women, Human rights, Gender-based violence, Legal protection, Exploitation.
