Procreative Choices, Consequences, and Intentions

Abstract: This article aims at analysing Davide Battisti's book on the moral problems connected to new technologies for human reproduction. It highlights the relevance of the consequence-based person-affecting morality proposed by the author, and clarifies some of its characteristics and consequences. Moreover, it critically discusses some problematic issues: the distinction between actual and possible people on the one hand, the role given to intentions and attitudes in the moral evaluations of actions on the other.

Keywords: Reproduction, Non-identity problem, Person-affecting morality, Actual people, Possible people.
